Dear Ms. Brennan:

This letter is to confirm our recent telephone conversation. I had called NVE to complain about one of your products, Stacker 2.

As I mentioned on the phone my son, Brett, took Stacker 2 to lose some weight before his wedding. On September 21st, he took a couple pills during his bachelor's party at Put-in-Bay, which is an island off Port Clinton, OH. Luckily, my husband was there because he said they hadn't been there long and suddenly Brett's eyes just went blank and he passed out. One of his friends admitted that they took a couple Stacker 2 pills that night so when the paramedics couldn't revive him, they had to life-flight him to a hospital in Sandusky, OH. The paramedic said they had just returned from life-fighting a female to the same hospital and she had also taken Stacker 2. The emergency room doctor told my husband that the same scenario happens much too often - - he also said it was a good thing that Brett was in such good physical condition or things might have been much worse.

Luckily, Brett did come out of it and seems to have no lasting side-effects. Unluckily, this happy couple now has a lot of medical bills to start off their marriage.

I think the Stacker 2 commercials are very misleading! They show Kenny Wallace and his racing buddies lifting cars and acting like the pills will toughen you up and give you big boosts of energy. What a joke! These pills could kill you! I think the ads are especially misleading because they are shown endlessly during NASCAR races and therefore appeal to people who already may have a tendency to drink.

Please reconsider your advertising. There are so many people that are desperate to lose weight and I feel that your pills are extremely dangerous. If by chance there is a mass lawsuit filed against your company, please include us.

Sadly
